New Mexico is practically synonymous with adobe-style architecture, but there’s another side to the Land of Enchantment. The Frank Lloyd Wright Building Conservancy uncovers hidden gems of modern and organic architecture in the Santa Fe and Albuquerque areas, including a very special visit to Wright’s Arnold Friedman House (1945), the first of Wright’s two “teepee” houses, still owned by the original family and seldom open to visitors. Distinctive works by famed organic architect Bart Prince, Wright scholar Anthony Alofsin, AIA Gold Medal winner Ricardo Legoretta, and a special tour dedicated to artist Georgia O’Keeffe round out the Conservancy’s first event in New Mexico.

Main Event

Saturday, May 2

- Arnold Friedman House (Wright, 1945) | Built of stone walls, rough-sawn pine boards and cedar shakes, this elegantly rustic lodge in rural Pecos has a 28-foot ceiling in the living space spanned by rafters that create a kaleidoscope of geometric forms—a system of construction Wright used only here. Its owners have kept it true to Wright’s design.

- Geller House (Bart Prince, 2019) | Featured in Dwell, this art-filled house of concrete block, patinaed metals and glass is linear and geometric in contrast to Prince’s other sinuous, contoured designs.

- Whitmore House (Bart Prince, 2001) | Blending into its red rock backdrop, this house’s varied geometric forms cascade down the sloping landscape.

- Lewis-Feidt House (Anthony Alofsin, 1993) | This house recasts the principles of traditional adobe construction using modern materials.

- Santa Fe Art Institute (Ricardo Legoretta, 1999) | We close the day with a reception and presentation on AIA Gold Medal-winning Mexican architect Legoretta in one of his several Santa Fe designs.

Departs by bus from the Hilton Santa Fe Historic Plaza at 9 a.m. and returns approx. 5 p.m. Box lunch on bus and reception are included.
